TO THE COLLECTOR

This List is frankly something in the nature of an experiment. As our friends know, our policy has always been to try to include a wide range of coins in Coin Galleries' Catalogues in order that there may be something to attract everyone. While a coin Dealer is in business, we feel that our profession must make the personal interest of the Collector one of primary consideration, above and beyond the purely commercial aspect of buying and selling coins. It is quite possible that this point of view may be new and original to many Collectors, but it is a valid one. Now that we have gone this far in disclosing the Dealer's approach to his customers, we might as well go one step further. We like to handle nice coins as much as you do or we probably wouldn't be engaged in the business. We also like to see the right man get the right coin. Your satisfaction in your purchase is just as important as your check to us.

With all these things in mind, nevertheless, on this one occasion we have departed from our usual approach and are presenting a List that is entirely devoted to the coins and medals of the Papacy and the Order of Malta. There are several reasons for our decision. Primarily, the Papal group had grown to substantial proportions during the last year. It seemed a pity not to present the coins as a unit. Many of them are exceptionally fine, particularly the Scudi which come close, in our opinion, to being the handsomest Crowns in the early European series. The complete listing was not quite large enough for one catalogue so we decided to present what Papal medals we had in stock. The coins of the Order of Malta were added because the Order, still a very active body today with wide international connections, has been associated with organized Christianity for nearly nine-hundred years. Endowed with Sovereignty, the Knights of St. John, like the Papacy, had the right to coin money and used it. The result is, as you now see, a specialized catalogue. We hope that some few of you will find pieces that you like. Perhaps some of you may develop an interest in Papal coins. Certainly the history they embody is more stimulating than that of many of the national States that exist today.

Before closing, let me say just a word about our next List. We are hard at work preparing #22. There will again be an interesting selection of fine coins in all price ranges. Many of them are in exceptionally fine condition and may solve the Christmas problem for some of you.

THE VATICAN CITY STATE AND PAPAL SOVEREIGNTY

It would be manifestly impossible to write a history of the Papacy in a Coin Galleries Price List. Libraries are devoted to the subject, closely involved as it is with the history of the Western World as we know it. Needless to say, there is much in the story of the recognition of the primacy of the Bishop of Rome in the Christian Church that has nothing to do with Numismatics and would have no place here. We are interested in coins, and in such matters that in one way or another affect their issue. It is, therefore, not inappropriate to devote a few remarks to the background of the present Vatican City State and to attempt to explain the meaning of Papal sovereignty insofar as that sovereignty bears on Numismatics.

Our own concepts of Government in America today certainly never let us forget that the Ship of State is floated on what seems like an awfully wide and deep sea of money. Each Spring we grumble about the weather and taxes, but, as has been said before, nobody ever does anything about either that could be called an improvement. The fact of the matter is that no form of Government has ever operated without money and the governed, in one way or another, foot the bills. What has changed are the methods by which the money is raised. The Medieval World also paid taxes to Authority. Authority, at that period, generally had sources for needed funds that extended beyond the taxing power. While there are curious exceptions, it can be said that little of the U. S. Government's income is derived from property that it owns. For a great deal of recorded history the Ruler's income, contrary to our experience, was to a great extent based on real property, just as much of a wealthy man's income today will be derived from Stocks and Bonds. The difference lay in the fact that, in the past, income derived from land came either from the sale of the produce, or the direct use of that produce to provide the necessities of life. In the case of a Medieval Ruler, the income from his land had to support the machinery of Government and quite frequently provide the sinews of war. The Medieval Prince was also supported by the power to levy taxes on his subjects—the people who lived on his lands. Land, and the control of it, then, provided the basis for income.

The control of land was acquired by various means. Inheritance was certainly an important source of land. Another source was by gift from a supreme political power—in the early Medieval period in Europe, the Holy Roman Emperor—for service rendered, or for services that were hoped would be rendered. You could also acquire land by force in time of war. Very early in the period in question there were many Rulers of high and low degree, each one pretty much master within the borders of his own territories. These men, by virtue of their position, were endowed with "Sovereignty" to a greater or lesser extent. By "Sovereignty" we mean that they had independent power within the borders of their own lands. They collected taxes and sooner or later coined money.

We see from this rather compressed discussion that the question of independence, land, and the issuance of coins were all connected. In due course, after the great National States of England, France and Spain, to name only three, appeared on the map, the coinage powers were centralized in the hands of the Ruler of the Nation. This was not true in Medieval times, not only because of the fact that minor Princes had Sovereignty and because there were no National central authorities, but because it would not have been practical to have the only source of the supply of hard money located in one spot, like the Royal Mint in London. In the Jet and Lunick Age it is hard for us to realize how incredibly poor the means of communication were in Medieval Europe. There were few roads, and these were in bad shape. Wagons and carts were as primitive as the roads. Transport was further complicated by the myriad borders that had to be crossed and the little taxes levied by each petty sovereign at his borders. It follows that the best and simplest means of providing a coinage was for each Ruler to strike his own. Remember that this condition of affairs lasted a long time. There are a few people still alive today who were born before Italy was unified between 1860 and 1870. These elder citizens lived in an era when one of Europe's principal National States was divided into two Kingdoms, an Austrian dominion, an assortment of Duchies of varying importance and the Papal States, each of which struck its own coins. While the condition just referred to has long been regarded as a "bad thing" by liberal historians, we cannot resist commenting that Numismatically it had its advantages. Today there are no Italian "Indian Head Cents" running on interminably, for instance, so that the Collector cannot be led astray into the monotonous desert of dates.

It is against the background just discussed that we now must regard the emergence of a Papal State. As the supremacy of the Bishop of Rome was recognized and as the role of the Popes in the survival and shaping of Christianity became more and more important, it became quite apparent that he would need income. Now it might be argued that if the Popes needed money they could go to the Emperors and ask for it. Certainly the Emperor was Christian and it would not seem likely that he would not want to support the most important man in the Church. As a matter of fact this was a solution to the problem that the Papacy wished to avoid at all costs. It was essential that it be able to maintain itself independently of any political power that might wish to make use of the Christian Church for its own purposes. We may tend to forget today the great importance that the Church and the Popes played in the survival of the Western World. The doctrines of Mohammed carried tremendous force in Africa and the Near East. For centuries the danger that Islam might overwhelm Christian Europe was a real one. Every resource, spiritual, political and military, was used before the threat of Islam finally disappeared. We are all too familiar with a not dissimilar situation in the World today.

It was through the forces of historical logic, based on a firm foundation of financial necessity, that the Papal States came into being with the result that the Popes found themselves Political as well as Spiritual leaders. With the "Donations" of the Frankish Kings that began with the grant of towns and provinces to Pope Stephen II in 752, the Papacy gradually extended control over a broad belt of territory stretching across central Italy. The limits of the Papal States, as they became known, were fairly well established by the middle of the 13th Century. They included not only Rome and the immediate environs, but ran as far south as Terracina on the Mediterranean Coast and as far north as the river Pescaia, running eastward along the Siennese border into the province of Umbria. The border then swung northwards skirting Tuscany and over to the Adriatic, encompassing the area known as the Romagna, dominated by the rich city of Bologna. To the southeast on the Adriatic side were the Marches, a rich agricultural territory with a flourishing sea trade. It was not easy to rule successfully any part of Italy in the turbulent Medieval and Renaissance eras. Successful rule is, and was then, measured in terms of peace, prosperity and political stability. Enmity sprang up between the Pope and the Emperor which led to the former leaving Italy for Avignon in 1309 where the Papacy remained for 70 years. Then the ambitions of the Italian Princes caused riot and confusion throughout the Peninsula in the 14th and 15th Centuries. The Italians were aided and abetted by King Charles VIII of France and the Emperor Charles V. One of these monarchs invaded all Italy while the other captured and sacked Rome itself, besieging the Pope in the Castel St. Angelo. The Papacy found exceptional difficulty in maintaining the secular independence felt to be necessary for its spiritual mission and in ruling the States of the Church with the firm hand required to produce a steady income.

In spite of the myriad complexities that faced it, the Church maintained control over its own independent territories until 1870. How this was done and how the Papal States became merged with Italy is part of the history of modern Europe and cannot concern us in detail here. It is sufficient to remember that when Pius IX retreated to the precincts of the Vatican Palace in the Fall of 1870, declaring himself a "prisoner", the Sovereignty that had been inherent in the Pontiff as a Political Ruler ceased. Without Sovereignty, and territory for that matter, the Pope was in no position to continue to exercise one of the most important rights of a Prince—the issuance of coins. So the coinage that had begun in the early part of the 9th Century stopped. It wasn't until Pius XI composed the differences separating the Vatican from Italy that the Papacy regained Sovereignty once again. In 1929, along with certain financial concessions, the Lateran Treaty was signed that set up the Vatican City State, a tiny area within Rome, comprising St. Peter's, the Vatican and other Palaces and administrative buildings over which the Pope has absolute political control. So in 1929 coinage was again resumed and continues to this day.

Like other Princes of the times the early Popes coined in various Mints. Following Rome, those at Bologna and Ferrara were the most prolific. Julius II opened mints at Perugia, Parma and Reggio. When Pius VI was forced to leave Rome in 1799, thanks to the activities of the French, there were ten different mints operating, not counting Rome and Bologna. In the List following, several of these Mints will be identified by their marks. It must be remembered that the inadequate transportation and security facilities of the times required a number of Mints strategically located in various parts of any principality. Since the meaning of the Latin mottos on Papal coins is also a source of great interest, we are including a translation of those mottos found on the pieces in this List. We trust that you will find it useful.

In presenting these coins and medals for the Collector's consideration, we must note that we were not able to find an example of a coin for every one of the Popes that issued them. There are gaps in the series. We do feel that we have made a concerted effort and that the results are at least respectable. It will be noted that the coins in gold and silver are grouped by Papal reign, as are the silver and bronze medals. The few bronze coins, and the gold medals, on the other hand, are grouped together as units. All the cataloguing for this list was done by George Weyr.

ST. PIUS X ACQUIRES A COIN

“THE VATICAN COLLECTION OF PAPAL COINS

An interesting addition to the fine collection of Papal coins and medals in the Vatican cabinet, recently presented to His Holiness, was announced to the Sacred College by the Pope on the occasion of his name-day. The Pontiff told the Cardinals that a gold coin had been given him as a jubilee gift by the Diocese of Acqui. This coin was discovered in 1898, while excavations were going on for the foundations of a new church at Acqui. It proved to be the only coin in existence of the period of Innocent IX, a Pope of the Facchinetti family of Bologna, who succeeded Gregory XIV, Oct. 29, 1591, and died Dec. 30, following, reigning for only two months. His death followed so soon after his accession that coins bearing his name have always been classed among the rarest of the Papal series, and their existence has been doubted by collectors.

The Diocese of Acqui was unable to pay the architect who had drawn the plans for the new church; it therefore gave him the coin with the understanding that if he sold it for over $1,200.00 (the amount of his bill), the surplus should be returned to the Diocese. The architect accepted the gift, but he was unable to find a purchaser. He offered it to King Victor Emmanuel, but His Majesty would not give more than $500.00. Later the clergy of the Diocese collected the $1,200.00, bought the piece from the architect, and presented it to the Pope. This coin is said to have been the only one lacking to complete the Vatican collection of coins issued under all the Popes.”

PIUS IX

1846-1878

Cardinal Giovanni Mastai Ferretti was elected to the Supreme Pontificate in 1846 with a reputation as a liberal Prelate. It was his fate to have the longest and one of the momentous reigns in the history of the Papacy. His distrust of the deep seated centrifugal forces of disunity he detected in Italian political life lead him to oppose the "Risorgimento". In 1848 grave disturbances in the city of Rome led the Pope to flee to Gaeta in the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies where he was granted asylum by King Ferdinand II. The Pope's retirement to the precincts of the Vatican after the capture of Rome in 1870 resulted in a deep schism within Italy that was not healed until the Lateran Pact of 1929.

The long reign of Pius IX was characterized by many acts which emphasized the Church's adaptation to forces of the Age. In Newman and Manning the first English Cardinals were created since the Reformation. The Hierarchy was re-established in Holland and the Latin Patriarchate set up in Jerusalem. The North American College was founded in Rome to train young seminarians of promise from the New World, and the United States was given its first Cardinal when Archbishop Mc Closkey of New York received the Red Hat in 1875. After 1870 the Papal coinage ceased, not to be resumed until 1929.

COINAGE OF THE ORDER OF MALTA

The inclusion of a small selection of coins of the Order of Saint John of Jerusalem, called Malta in a catalogue devoted to the coinage of the Papacy needs no apology. The Knights of Malta rendered great service both to the Papacy and to their fellow Christians after the founding of the Order in the 12th. Century. It can be added that the Order is alive and active today and by no means exists only as an historical memory. While the military functions of the Knights of Malta are now largely ceremonial, the charitable work carried out and the maintenance of Hospitals places the Order in Europe in the same category as the Red Cross in the United States. It can be added that there are also American members of the Order.
